tables are functional objects they are also often quite fancy and have developed a vernacular of evolving industries it is a very helpful thing...

the production of tables will outlive us

...making a table from scratch, the person's body and available tools; active and work is soulful!

the division of labour dislocates a person, factories appear and buttons are pressed older hands-on skills are weened out with nothing to fall back on - more reliant on capital thrown into a pool of disenfranchised cheap labour with no choice but to be at the whim of capital no skills, no jobs!

more tables are produced quicker resorting to stealing provides reason for capital to lock up the thief thankfully many tables are still provided and this superfluous influx gives space for the table to become the kind of commodity used in these luxury markets

the production of a so-called critical art is invented

Investigate Clues to the Origin of Time

Time runs out fast. From the string and setting of the sun to the cycles of nature and the heartbeat in our day, nothing is so personal as time. And yet it is so difficult to explain. Time seems to be woven into the very fabric of the universe. But why?

Ian Proctor has a PhD in physics and is a senior research fellow at the University of Cambridge. He is also a member of the Royal Society and has written several books on physics and time.
